The impact fee paid by developers to address school capacity issues may not be collected for two years if the Carroll County Board of Commissioners act on a suggestion by the county's leading budget advisor.

The county's impact fee provides facilities and infrastructure improvements for schools and parks in connection to housing growth. Ted Zaleski, director of the county's department of management and budget, said he doesn't expect the capacity of county schools to be affected by home building over the next two fiscal years.
